Introduction (as published)

The report frames the United Kingdom as a diverse and changing society in which Black, Asian and minority ethnic (BAME) communities form one of the largest and consistently growing populations — around thirteen percent of the country's population (approximately 8.1 million people, per the 2011 Census). It notes that BAME communities have long been part of the UK's history and have contributed substantially to the country's growth and development, but that these contributions are often overshadowed by persistent racist attitudes and discrimination. The report argues that discriminatory attitudes, frequently portrayed as relics of the past, continue to have a significant impact on the lives of BAME individuals.

The policy report sets out to: examine the gravity of racial discrimination and its effects on the BAME community across different aspects of life; review policies enacted to alleviate or stop racial discrimination across sectors; and recommend the policy changes needed to help eliminate racial discrimination in UK society and improve life chances and quality of life for BAME individuals.

Relevance and how this anchors the LPA corpus

As a community-authored policy report, this document grounds the race/ethnicity typology index in RCC's own analysis of how racist narratives operate in the UK. Its central argument — that contemporary racism often presents as subtle, "neutral-seeming", or framed as historical rather than current — directly supports the system's attention to implicit and coded hostility (the under-moderation failure mode) and to narrative framing rather than overt slurs. When the full report is indexed, its account of discrimination across sectors and its policy framing will provide community-grounded reference evidence for interpreting framing-based and discursive harms.
