About the research

Race Council Cymru undertook exploratory research on the needs and experiences of people from Black, Asian and minority ethnic (BAME) backgrounds living in Wales, collecting baseline information against which to identify key priorities for promoting good race relations in the Welsh context. The ethnic minority population of Wales is small but growing, and the research identified the extent to which racism and discrimination affect the many and varied BAME communities living across Wales.

Aim

To identify the extent to which racism and discrimination are issues affecting BAME communities across Wales, and to explore their experiences in relation to housing, employment, education and policing, including experiences of living in neighbourhoods and communities in Wales.

Method

The research combined a review of what is already known about race equality issues in Wales, interviews with organisations working with BAME communities, focus-group meetings with individuals from different BAME backgrounds, and a survey of lived experiences. It took place across Wales and engaged a wide range of BAME communities. The findings are published across three editions (2012, 2015 and 2016).

How this anchors the LPA corpus

This report grounds the race/ethnicity and national-origin typology indices in empirical, Welsh-specific evidence about how racism is experienced across everyday domains (housing, employment, education, policing, and neighbourhood life). Two features make it especially useful as corpus reference evidence: it is lived-experience-based (interviews, focus groups, survey), aligning with the system's emphasis on community-defined harm rather than majority-default norms; and it is Wales-specific, capturing the small-but-growing, geographically dispersed character of Welsh minority ethnic communities that national UK datasets under-represent. It complements the Anti-racist Wales Action Plan (policy framing) with community-collected evidence, and pairs with the Deconstructing Racist Narratives report (narrative and discourse framing).
